But surely prostitution is not the alternative. The point of view of all these papers is hardly that of the life insurance companies, and yet in view of the constantly increasing importance of the problem some action must be taken. It is absolutely certain that venerealism in its various forms is costing the companies vast sums of money every year, and they are vitally interested in the problem of bettering the conditions. The loss from premature deaths due to acquired venerealism is something startling, and it is full time that something was done, but nothing without the fullest discussion and the nearest approach to experiment possible in the premises. We believe that the period of discussion has hardly begun, and that the duty of making haste slowly must be impressed on all. It is also worth while to rest on what has been done until the facts in respect to the vaccination as an item in the prevention have been fully determined. It is clearly within the bounds of experimental science to test this matter of attenuation in passage through the Macacus. So far the experiments have not been as perfectly controlled as is needful, but they cannot now be long delayed, and if the results obtained are real and not simply appearances sterile of all hope then syphilis will presently become as rare as smallpox. None the less, the medical profession, the people of the United States and...
