Excerpt: .of some few preachers of acknowledged attainments in pulpit oratory, both in the Protestant and Roman Catholic connections. The general character of the French school of preaching resembles that of the German, and is quite unlike that of the English. The English preachers disdain the arts of oratory, the French revel in animated diction, and graceful gesture. The former are solid, the latter ornamental. The former delve in theological lore, and feed the understanding; the latter elaborate eloquent paragraphs, to rouse up the sensibilities, and kindle into a blaze the feelings. The former have more of light, the latter more of heat. Both have their faults. If the former are instructive, they are also too dull and heavy. If the latter are animating and soul-stirring, they are sometimes too showy and bombastic. If the former arc wise in having an eye to the intellect, and...
