Prognosis.--Since the discovery of Flexner s serum the prognosis is fairly good, provided the diagnosis is made early. The I prognosis is also governed by the severity of the case. In spite of proper treatment some cases succumb rapidly to the disease. In others recovery is incomplete, certain symptoms, such as deafness, paralysis, blindness, headache, etc., becoming more or less permanent. Diagnosis.--The condition is to be differentiated from other forms of meningitis, typhoid fever, uremia, etc. The presence of herpes, the history of the case, and the fact that spinal puncture yields a fluid containing an intracellular diplococcus will readily enable one to make a correst diagnosis. Treatment.--The patient should be kept in a cool, quiet, darkened room, and ice-bags should be applied to the head and spine. The bowels...
