Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1862. Excerpt: . . . have been to rush on certain destruction to all the party. They could see, far out at sea, their boat, which had had to tack many times in order to reach the eastern side of the islet. It seemed unlikely that she would reach the foot of the cliff on which they were before morning. They therefore resolved to descend, while the light yet served them, to a little grassy platform which seemed large enough for the purpose, and there to rest for the night. The second sailor, whose name was Brown, volunteered to act as watch, and nurse to poor Randall, who became very feeble and exhausted as soon as the first excitement of his deliverance had passed away. But Sandie could not rest until he had made Mr. Percy aware of the horrible sight which he had seen in his difficult progress, and of his suspicions of the existence of some buried treasure, which his haste to assist Randall had prevented him from stopping to verify. Mr. Percy was too well aware how the minds of men in general, and of seamen in particular, are excited by the idea of hidden wealth, to rely much on this part of Sandies story. The skeleton is perhaps that of Don Truxillos wife, said he, smiling. There may after all be some truth in that yarn! 1 think not, Sir, said Sandie. I am no doctor, but I am sure that those bones are too...
