It is not the design of one mind, but of many minds; it is not the product of one period, but of a succession of periods. As our laws, our social and political institutions are the result of ages of effort and experimentation, so have the same processes moulded our organic structures into what they now are. First, there must be a realisation of the want felt, and, second, an intelligent effort to supply that want. Wants and efforts are the real factors in organic modifications. In the sanguiferous system the object aimed at, however imperfect may have been the performance, was to provide the organism with the necessary nutrient material; but the numerous tentative changes made in the system show the absence of unity of plan which we would expect if it were the product of...
